The chancel alone, in which the choir of monks is loated, is 90 feet long. An auditorium of his size would ordinarily require a very large instrument; but in this instance it must be of unusual power and carrying capacity to adequately support the heavy voices of the large male choir, which may times number as many as 250 voices. The instrument consists of a large three-manual gallery organ of 35 stops and a two manual sanctuary organ of 20 stops, to be located 100 feet distant in one of the transepts. The latter organ is for accompanying the choir. The gal-lery organ has its own three-manual console and will be used for accompanying a festival choir of men's and boys' voices for processional, offertories, florid com-positions and other incidental music There will be a three-manual console in the chancel, by which either of the two organs may be played, or both may be played at the same time from this con-sole. The conections between the console and the two organs are by electric current. The current exciting magnets which throw into operation the pneumatic action used in all Estey pipe organs.
